Boston, Sept. 18, 1862.

My darling Fanny:

Enclosed, you will find several card photographs of myself, which you will find on the back addressed to those for whom they are intended. If you cannot make it convenient to deliver them in person, hand them to Mr. Johnson, and he will kindly see them properly distributed.

I fear you were unfortunate in your visit to Orange, as to the weather. If it rained much, you could form no idea of the beauty of the surrounding scenery, the ^{Luxury Park} park, &c.

I take it for granted you are now in the city, and probably at Dr. Percy's. Be assured, we shall all rejoice to see you safely home again; and you must determine how much longer to remain away. But we wish you to see and enjoy as much as possible while you are absent.

I send you three dollars, as you may need it all in your various excursions.

You doubtless received the package of letters sent for you to the care of Mr. Johnson, and the five dollars I enclosed therein to pay your passage home. Should any thing occur to make it necessary, or convenient to have some more money, either inform me to that effect, or borrow some of Oliver, and I will pay him. Be particular in paying for your washing.

There is nothing special at home. We are all well, and were gratified to have a line from you at Orange. Your mother, in special, would like to hear a little more frequently from you, if you can get the time to write.

Give our household love to the Percys, Brambills, Gibbons, Stoppers, &c.

Your affectionate father,
Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

Fanny Garrison.

P. S. Richard Hallowell has just come in, and says that his brother Norwood has been wounded in the arm, and young Wendell Holmes in the neck, in the late bloody battle; but how badly he has not yet ascertained. I have been fearing we should have intelligence like this.
